People who know me know that I'm kind of a mixture of skepticism and gullibility. On one hand, I've been around the block a few times and have pretty good street instincts. On the other hand, I'm still a soft touch in many circumstances. So I guess you could say that there are two facets of my personality that are constantly at war with each other. Sometimes that makes it hard to know what to think when I encounter a Poverello situation.

Recently, I experienced this conflict regarding one of the men in our drug program. I was in the dining room, and I saw him hiding his face. He was a fairly new guy, and I approached him thinking that he must be ill. As I got closer, I saw that he was crying. I was about to ask him what was wrong, when he looked up, threw his arms around me, and sobbed, "Oh, Papa Mike!"

Now, I'm not exactly a touchy-feely kind of a guy, so I was a little uncomfortable, and more than a little shocked. He held on and cried for a short time, and I awkwardly patted his back until he finally let me go. Naturally, I was curious, so I asked what was going on.

His explanation was that he was overcome with gratitude to be in the program. He said that he felt as though he'd been rescued from the Titanic. He also said that I resembled his father, so I guess that might have prompted some of the emotion, too. I guess things out there had gotten pretty bad for him, and he was realizing that this was an opportunity to stop his self-destructive behavior and begin life anew.

At some level, I can understand what he was going through. My own experiences in the 1960s left me spiritually and emotionally exhausted, and when Father Simon offered me a ray of hope, I was immensely relieved. However, gratitude came to me gradually; for this young man, it hit him like a load of bricks.

Having seen men come and go in our Resident Program, I was a little doubtful, however. I wondered if this emotion was a temporary fix that would be of little help when he really started facing the wreckage of his life. I'm happy to say that he's still here, and that's a good sign.

Many of us get good and sick of the things we're doing that are hurtful to others or ourselves. We try to change, but eventually fall flat on our faces. When I was diagnosed with diabetes many years ago, I immediately resolved to change my eating and exercise habits. I did—for a while. Then, I ended up lapsing back into patterns that were as familiar and comfortable as my own skin. Needless to say, I still have diabetes.

It's the same with drug addiction. Even the most sincere desire to quit using can fall prey to old habits. Behavior and thinking patterns can be almost impossible to change. That's why we have a program. It gives men structure, support, and encouragement. It points them to a higher power, without whose help most are doomed. It also provides a constant reminder, through group meetings, counseling, and serving people whose addictions have led them into homelessness, that each man in the program is just one drink or one hit away from losing everything.

Common sense, and studies of human behavior, lend credence to the idea that working together with others is more productive than working alone. In the case of making lifelong changes, the support of fellow sufferers is almost always essential. We're hardwired to need other people, and sometimes the hardest step toward change is accepting this fact; for some reason, whether it is due to pride, fear or just plain old human nature, we like to think we can whip our problems by ourselves. Thank the Good Lord that there are places people can go, such as our rehabilitation program, that help people move from lonely failure to supported success.

House

The More Things Change...

...the more they stay the same. At Poverello House, the aphorism is often on the lips of people who have been around here for many years.

Few would deny that the process of change has accelerated in our lifetimes. With computers, the internet, smart phones and quantum leaps in all other kinds of technology, the world has become smaller, faster, and in some ways, more confusing and frightening.

Yet, in spite of dizzying change, human nature seems to remain constant. The poor are with us always, as Jesus said, and their needs for food, shelter, medical care and compassion are the same as they were when Christ walked the roads of the Middle East.

A more local example is how the street drugs have altered throughout the years. From heroin to methamphetamines, addictions have changed with each introduction of newer, cheaper drugs, but the needs of a homeless drug addict are constant: structure, accountability, support, spiritual guidance, and hope are the ingredients necessary to a new life, whether one is addicted to cheap wine or crystal meth.

Poverello also has changed tremendously in its forty-plus years of existence.

However, a seemingly immutable aspect of Poverello House has been Mike McGarvin, “Papa Mike” to everyone around here. Our founder’s role has evolved over the years, but Mike’s vision for Poverello has never wavered, and his warm, personal one-on-one contact with the homeless has been a hallmark of our organization from its humble beginnings until the present.

But none of us are immune to Father Time. Age and health issues are forcing changes on Mike, and thus forcing changes at Poverello House. His physical presence is no longer as ubiquitous as it once was, and while he still greets people in our dining room at mealtime, it is often for much shorter times than in days past.

Mike's wife Mary spoke recently about him slowing down. She said ever since she's known Mike, he's been a "homeless magnet." They always seemed to run into homeless people, and Mike would inevitably strike up conversations and help out when he could. She said that now that Mike doesn't drive or even get out much, she tries to think in terms of "What would Mike do?" She stops to talk and listen to homeless people, something that Mike has always instinctively known to be vitally important to the homeless.

While Mike has set a standard, it's comforting to know that Poverello still strives to live up to that standard. We have a solid staff that embraces our mission, and virtually thousands of volunteers who embody Mike's love for the poor. Even from those earliest days, when Mike was serving on the streets, he wasn't alone for long. Volunteers, wonderful volunteers, came beside him and caught his vision, helping him to keep going and expanding the work he began.

So again, we have to say that the more things change, the more they stay the same. Mike is still doing as much as he can, and his presence here will always be inspirational and significant, but he's less able to do as much as he used to. As Mike's life changes, though, it's good to realize that his mission is ongoing, unchanging, and carried on through dedicated employees and volunteers. May it always be so.
